2021, Volume 1

Reflecting on a Year of Hitting Pause

One year ago, COVID-19 changed our lives. In 2020, we grappled with changes in our daily routines, isolation from friends and family, and the stress of staying safe from COVID-19. Our minds have spent the past year in a state of worry, buzzing with uncertainty.

Now, for a moment, try to take your mind off everything. Studies have shown that, assuming your most basic needs are taken care of, taking a pause is crucial to happiness. The Science of Well-Being, a course at Yale devoted to the psychology of being happy, is even available for free at coursera.org. The biggest takeaway: Our behavior — not our circumstances — plays the most important role in our happiness.

Here are some proven ways to increase happiness:

Keep a gratitude journal. Write down what you're grateful for — big or small — each day. Take a moment to think about each thing as you're giving thanks. Have you learned important lessons that you can apply to the future? Maybe Zoom allowed you to feel more connected to faraway relatives. Did you spend more time assisting people in need?

Be physically active. Moving your body boosts your mood. Take time to exercise, especially now. A simple walk, run, or dance session can change your day.

Meditate. It's okay if thoughts swirl as you're trying to calm your mind. Acknowledge them, then refocus on your breathing. Research has shown that meditating as little as 10 minutes a day can increase happiness.

COVID-19 Vaccines and Testing

To see if you are in a category of people eligible for a vaccine, visit your city or state's COVID-19 vaccine websites for information. You will pay $0 out-of-pocket for both doses of the vaccine. In some cases, the government may cover the cost. Visit cdc.gov for trusted information on vaccine safety, doses, and more.

If you are experiencing symptoms or have been exposed to COVID-19, testing to diagnose COVID-19 is covered when ordered by a doctor, nurse, or pharmacist. For more information, visit emblemhealth.com/covid19.
